Izzy has always had a keen interest in the fashion and beauty industry and when she was scouted to model as a teenager, she grabbed the opportunity with both hands. Whilst having changed gears slightly, studying Fashion Communications now, she continues to successfully blend her two worlds in the pursuit of becoming a storyteller and writer.

Thanks to leveraging her pre-existing modelling connections and using her voice through her Social channels, the industry has quickly given her the attention this emerging talent deserves.

The Beautiful and Damned

A century on from London's original party set, there's a fresh gang living it up across the capital. Joe Bromley joins them for an evening of pure socialite theatre...

“I NAMED THE SIGNATURE COCKTAIL FOR MY 21ST BIRTHDAY PARTY ‘STAR FER’”

London is, in so many ways, the same old playground for its Bright Young Things as it was for the dandy poets, painters and photographers of the Twenties and Thirties. They can still leapfrog through Selfridges, have treasure hunts across town, attend circus-themed parties and use petrol to set fire to the Thames. With the exception of the latter, it is no stretch to imagine the city's golden girls and guys finding a great deal of joy in all of the above today: fuelled by drinks, 'party accoutrements' and general debauchery that never have and never will go out of vogue.

What has changed is who gets a shot at joining this merry gang of glass-skinned, party-hopping, 'look at you!' shouting socialites — with their respective side hustles, still of poetry writing, painting and photographing, but also of modelling, party hosting and influencing — in the first place. I was asked to congregate the cream of the let's-meet-at-the-Saatchi-private-view-and-go-from-there-yeah crop with a week's notice, and fired off invites for a Thursday evening accompanied by the company card. One photographer, two photography assistants and nine devastatingly attractive kids you've probably never heard of (but might well know their parents' names) came together. What could possibly go wrong?

ACT I: AESTHETES ASSEMBLE

We meet in the upstairs, members-only sector of the storied brasserie, Langan's in Green Park, once privy to your Elizabeth Taylors, Princess Margarets and Mick Juggers ('members-only' is little more than a camp tagline — this crowd can actually spend all week in members' clubs, and be the proud member of none). The room has been sexed up in a 2021 refurbishment, with voluptuous, red lacquer ceilings and matching garish, velvet walls. At 6pm, the first three guests arrive: Wolf Gillespie, Allegra Handelman and Robin Hunter Blake. No introductions are needed.

Wolf, a rugged model signed to Kate Moss' agency, has his father, Primal Scream singer Bobby Gillespie's tousled, shoulder-length locks and hints of his mother, fashion stylist and long-time Alexander McQueen collaborator Katy England's face. He is a little quieter and more delicate in person than he might like to suggest online. He and Allegra, the block-fringed, rouge-lipped daughter of property developer Harry Handelman, catch up. Her 21st birthday, which was held in the St Pancras Renaissance Hotel owned by her father, was actually Bright Young Things themed. 'I named the night's signature cocktail "Star Fer",' she says.

Both are set to finish their degrees, from Goldsmiths and Queen Mary, respectively, in two months. 'What are you going to do with yours?' Wolf asks. 'It's a lens for my writing,' says Allegra, who is a poet and short story writer. And with his PPE? 'I would like to be prime minister,' he says. 'But it does seem like a lot of work.'

Robin, in the corner, is of another era. He has a shaved head, sharp jaw and convincingly old world style. His black, velvet slippers have golden tassels, worn with a pin-collared shirt, necktie and a grey, tailored overcoat. He has begun to get traction with his photographs, the best of which are bewitching, black-and-white portraits. Many capture his close friend Rocco Ritchie (son of Madonna and Guy Ritchie), who will make a flash appearance in just a few hours' time.

What does it take to make it as a young person in London? Wolf has the short, and only semi-ironic, answer: 'To know if someone is cool you simply times their Instagram followers by their parents' net worth. The higher the number, the cooler the person.'

Famous parents and smart social media accounts are two of the big six status markers for the vanguard, to which I will add: incredible beauty (always), a personality to keep a room entertained (less pressure on everyone else), a famous partner (the recent 'nepo' debate has only intensified this) and great creative talent (success, for now, remains sexy). Have two or more of these, and the likelihood is you're in — or choosing to opt out.

ACT II: THE SOCIAL CLIMB

More arrivals. The Flag Twins: Peckham-raised Ghanaian brothers with identical faces, each handsome enough to make anyone lose their train of thought. With a Gucci catwalk show under their belts, they're on the up. And gee-heck wizz, do they have personality. Their words, 'Eyy!', 'I'm chillllling, man!', 'It's all Fendi, baby!', zing across the room, and everyone doubles their volume. 'Look at you!' Model Izzy Richmond explodes through double doors in a dolphin splashed, JW Anderson top. 'Look at YOU! You look gorge!' she fires back.

This little mouse that roared is fresh into the group, and juggling fashion studies at Brighton University with the new-found rush that comes with being Lennon Gallagher's — body double of father, Oasis's Liam Gallagher — new girlfriend. 'I'm straddling two worlds,' she says.

'I'm so proud of you two, the faces of Adidas!' she pings to the twins, who are back from LA having posed for the brand with actress Jenna Ortega, of Netflix's Wednesday fame. Ortega is notoriously frosty. 'Did you get her laughing?' Izzy asks. 'Laughing!' they wail. 'We got that girl dancing!'

Finally, and fashionably late, come the last of the fashion set; plus-size model on the rise James Corbin, who has been
